

the 3D surface deformation produced by the Rudbar earthquake in very high resolution. We find the magnitude of surface slip to be higher than reported in the field, possibly due to distributed deformation occurring in the volume around the fault. Furthermore we identify a newly mapped surface rupture, highlighting the previously unknown structural complexity of this earthquake.